Interesting facts about Singapore & Malaysia:

- From the colonial-era Raffles Hotel to hyper modern futuristic condos and from classic Peranakan-era shophouses to Art-Deco inspired buildings, Singapore is an architecture lover's dream. Create a DIY tour with our lists of Singapore's Architectural Highlights and Singapore's Hidden Architectural Gems.
- Just think of a brand you have been dying to adore your wardrobe with, it is there. Everything is there in the high street markets of Singapore. The Orchard road is no less than a paradise for the shopaholics, Dover Street and Bugis street are other few shopping spots in the city. If you are looking out for some affordable shopping, Haji Lane is where you should blow all your money.
- Malaysia's long colonial history, it boasts an array of colonial architecture. If you're interested in this blast from the past, there can be no better spot to visit than Melaka. The city has been ruled by the British, the Dutch and the Portuguese, and its architecture reflects that. Just some of the buildings you can explore include the ruins of a 16th century Portuguese fortress, the oldest Protestant church in Malaysia and the Stadthuys Town Hall, which still stands as the oldest as well as the largest Dutch colonial building in the region.
- Perhaps the most fascinating aspect of Malaysia is its diverse culture. In addition to colonial influences, there are a mixture of Asian cultures present in the country. Malays make up approximately half of the population, Chinese make up roughly one quarter and there is a strong Indian community. In addition, the Orang Asli people, a group indigenous to Malaysia, still makes up 12 percent of the population. These groups live together harmoniously in Malaysia and give the country its vibrant culture and heritage.
